Counterargument

1) Globalization has increased the use of non-renewable resources and has contributed to pollution and global warming and firms are able to outsource production where environmental standards are less strict

Rebuttal

Although this is true, globalization is not purely at fault in this situation because the choice to use non-renewable resources is only a choice. If environmental standards around the world were more strict then the use of renewable resources would increase dramatically. Since environmental conditions affect the entire world (e.g. the US couldn't be the only country that is polluted-the pollution would spread everywhere) then the UN should consider this and make an attempt at raising a demanding universal standard for environmental protection around the world
